I think it's safe to say that Photoshop has a lot of fans, many of them quite critical, which is why it's one of the most-criticized pieces of software on the planet. It's also why I'm not a huge fan of Photoshop; it doesn't have any redeeming qualities for me... but that could be up for debate. The thing that bothers me is not even the interface, which is also not very intuitive. It's the application's inability to put up a notice warning me when I'm working on something that can be remotely secret (it's glaringly obvious that I can save money back into my checking account, but it's not displayed as such). Photoshop on the iPad Pro is a different story entirely, though.

ABOVE: The iPad Pro. The iPad Pro's screen is significantly nicer than what we're used to on the latest crop of iPhones, since they're now all 720p AMOLED screens, rather than the aforementioned 1,024x1,536s; it comes from the Retina Display era, and so is sharper and crisper (for more information, read LG Smartphones 2019: A Comparison ). It also supports True Tone, which means the screen itself interprets ambient lighting conditions to display things in the appropriate color gamut, rather than arbitrarily assuming your incandescent lightbulb is a point light source (already explained in our Apple Pencil review for iPad Pro, but worth saying again). The color gamut is different than any other screen on the planet right now, though, as it actually goes beyond the gamut of the retina display panel (in all of their specs, Apple usually gives the gamut of the panel, and not the full color gamut of what the pixel can be). This means you can do things like take a photo and color balance it to be a baseball team's team's colors, which you wouldn't otherwise be able to. It also means you can make a photo look like a painting, and so forth.
